Thought Trails from a Bar Mitzvah

Note: Any link highlighted in yellow is a link that, if you make that purchase, supports me financially (gas-money levels at this point). Any link highlighted in cyan is a link to another essay I wrote. And about my essays... Volume I of my essays are compiled here. Volume II is being worked on... and my last five are here:

On Trump and his “Disloyalty” Comment about Jews...

Shattered Barriers – a quick-ish post

The El Paso shooter... a thought experiment

Comments on an interview with TheExodusMovement’s Elizabeth Pipko

Speculation: The Real Reason for RUSSIA! RUSSIA!! RUSSIA!!!

A brief aside. The more devout I get, the more I see His hand in things. We’re doing remodeling, and the painter took pictures off the walls. Yesterday I was moving a piece of furniture and didn’t see one framed item leaning against the furniture and it fell, flat and glass-down, onto the floor with a loud bang. That picture was a multi-window frame with – among other things – the original conversion certificate. No damage to the glass. None whatsoever.

I find it inconceivable that the fall didn’t damage it. But it didn’t. That framed item was intimately connected to my children becoming Jewish.

Some might say “luck” or “coincidence”... I think differently.

AND SO I BEGIN...

As I mentioned in my first Red Pill Journey essay, back when I was guest-blogging on The Right Way: One Jew’s Red-Pill Journey – Part 1 of ? – with the last one (thus far) being Part 6 – I was raised as a very secular, purely “cultural” Jew. People who have known me since childhood are surprised at my wearing a kippa. I am determined to rekindle faith’s flame in myself and pass that to my children. Part of that rekindling was discovering and reading, and re-reading, this excellent book:

Twerski on Spirituality

So recently, in addition to focusing on work the last couple of weeks, we did travel to Israel for a brief vacation. A large part of this was to inculcate into my kids a love of their faith and our spiritual homeland – one of the things we did was plant some trees, one for each member of the family (there were a lot of carob trees in this orchard and I learned that carob was used as a sweetener in ancient times, along with honey, before the advent of processed sugar – and ate raw carob pods which weren’t bad). Also on my mind was to continue to subtly urge my wife onward in her stated plan to convert. This latter is a balancing act between taking advantage of her unexpectedly-voiced interest in doing so after over a decade of marriage, and not pushing “too hard” so that her naturally-stubborn nature starts to push back. Conversion – any conversion – must be because one is called to do so from within.

Anyway, my friend in Jerusalem wanted to take me to Shabbat morning services, and said there would be a bar mitzvah going on. Since I’ve only seen, lately, rather milquetoast ones at our synagogue, I figured a full-on Orthodox one would be educational. My own, done what seems like eons ago in a Conservative congregation, stands in my memory as strict and hard-core compared to the ones in our Conservative-but-leaning-Reform synagogue. (Once my wife goes through with her conversion I’m going to ramp up the pressure to switch to the local Chabad (Orthodox); this is also necessary as our children’s conversion by mikveh was done under Conservative rules – and an Orthodox conversion is needed for their Judaism to be universally recognized.)

them, often multiple ones on a single street. Signs of Judaism being the dominant culture are ubiquitous – in peoples' dress, in signs on restaurants highlighting that they're certified kosher, etc. Keep this in mind as I progress.

Anyway, we got there and the service itself was already underway. The small – compared to synagogues in the US – room was packed already and as people continued to enter it became elbow-to-elbow tight. Chairs were brought in to accommodate the larger-than-normal attendance. The women were separate, upstairs, overlooking the main floor which was – with the exception of a small girl or two with their father – all male.

The singing, all in Hebrew (as one would expect), was loud and confident. The prayers were familiar but often the melodies were not; I tried to follow along as best I could.

A COMMUNITY WITH CONFIDENCE

As people came in, including my host when he entered, something was very clear: people knew each other. There were many handshakes and waves and smiles as people greeted each other before opening their prayer books to join the service; complexions ranged from European Jew to browner Mizrahi / Sephardic coloration, and several obviously-black Jews came in – all equally greeted with smiles and warmth. So, too, was attendance obviously not a once-in-a-while thing (unlike many American synagogues including my own, where only on Yom Kippur is the hall's capacity even close to fully utilized) but this was obviously a group of people who came to services regularly. It was a community.

The singing, too, was loud and confident – as I mentioned. More, from the looks of peoples' faces, the traditional rocking that Jews do while praying, and other signs, it was clear that the people believed. This was not rote recitation of meaningless cant but strongly-voiced and enthusiastic praise of Hashem. (Note: we Jews do not write G O D out but, at the least, write G-d... more strict Jews, as I am trying to be, use Hashem, which translates literally as HA = the, SHEM = name, so "The Name".)

My friend explained that the father, attempting to direct traffic as people packed in, had eight children (my friend has five). That father beamed as his son read from the Torah, with someone next to him helping him through rough spots in his singing as he read with someone next to him helping him through tough spots in the singing as he read... and, with hand gestures, reminding the boy of how each word should be sung – long, short, raising or falling voice tone, etc. It was not one boy alone but with the support of his family and more broadly the synagogue's community behind him helping him complete his Rite of Passage.

Suddenly, small children with small plastic bags packed every spare space on the first floor and, as the ceremony finished, multiple bunches of small candies were tossed by the women above with an ensuing scramble by the kids. My friend said this helps develop quick reflexes as “too slow” gets nothing. But it was good-natured fun. I caught one of the candies and handed it to a girl of, perhaps, three with a smile and a “L’at (to you)”.

After the service itself was over we went outside to a small courtyard for a light meal – sandwiches, rice kugel (gag me), cakes & pastries, chips & bread with dips, accompanied with juice or wine or tea. Again, it was clear from the aggregated volume of conversation this was a group of people where people knew most everyone else. The groups swirled as people went to greet friends here and there. Families with multiple kids were common, and many of the married women were pregnant as well. Children darted out of sight of their parents to get to the table without said parents shrieking about where they were the moment the kid left their sight. (Walking home with my friend after we had Shabbat-eve dinner the night before with his parents, we traversed a local park; pointing to a group of people around a table my friend said this was a local Jewish singles group set up to help younger men and women meet – an obvious reference to creating a next generation.)

We had plans so we left the still-going-on eating to attend to those.

RESULTING THOUGHTS

First, this was not a bunch of people going through the motions nor were they there for the socializing – though that did occur. These people believed; more, they were linked not just by faith but also by a common culture. That culture – Judaism – was everywhere (as I said above). On Shabbat most of the country shuts down. The only people driving were non-religious Jews, and non-Jews; even with those, though, the streets were essentially silent. Everyone simply understands that one shops Thursday night, and early Friday, as the stores will be closing by mid-afternoon. Thus, in the overwhelming majority, Israel is largely a mono-culture. No “multi-cultural diversity” here; while olim from many countries are still settling in and tend to self-cluster, overarching is the fact they’re all Jews.

Second, Israel is a high-trust society... at least for the in-group. The prior visit I took my friend and his (age 12 and younger) children out to dinner at a local sandwich place, the New Deli, which is their version of Subway. Afterwards, his kids and mine went back to their apartment while my friend and I walked and talked. Children walking unattended in a crowded city? At night? I was nervous; my friend said “Nobody will bother them”. This time, too, walking around the twisty streets and alleys towards the central souk – market – the children ran ahead, out of sight, and I was again reassured by another visiting friend from up north “Nothing happens to children here. People who are bad are generally known, and are usually recognizable” which, IMHO, was a reference to non-Jews, i.e., Arabs. Pulling up to a checkpoint coming back from the Dead Sea the last visit we rolled down the window for a cursory examination before being waved through... as opposed to, say, a car full of Arabs that would likely get a much more stringent examination.

Racial profiling and behavior monitoring were clearly performed by security forces everywhere. As one example, going to a museum, we had to go through a metal detector; I took out my pocketknife – not a toy pen knife but a real one – and was admitted anyway... with said knife back in my pocket. Were I an Arab, or not wearing a kippa, I doubt I’d have been let through without surrendering it for the duration... if not having some police stopping by to inquire why I needed to carry a knife at all.

People at the beach routinely left their belongings by their chairs to run, as a group, to the water or go for a walk. Children would go to the play or exercise areas on the beach with no fear; if parents were there, it was because the kids were young, and multiple times I saw strangers helping solo kids with understanding how to use the exercise equipment without injury.

(A car left running in the middle of the alley with doors visibly unlocked as the owner went into a shop for several minutes with it remaining inviolate. People merely walked around it.)

Third, Israel is enormously pro-children. Baby strollers everywhere, with multi-children families being the norm. Pregnant women were common. This indicates a culture that believes it will be there in the future. Further, while I did see some “Here’s a phone now shut up” behavior by parents, it was more in the more-liberal-leaning Tel Aviv rather than much more traditionalist Jerusalem. Parents cared for, and interacted with, their children. And both my friends and the relatives I visited encouraged me to have more kids.

THINGS THEY HAVE IN SPADES, AND WE DON'T

Right off the bat, let me state that I do not believe DA JOOOOOOS are the architects of the mass migrations in the Great Replacement, whether into Europe or America. While some of the players are Jews – JINOs IMHO – they’re misusing Judaism to rationalize their beliefs stemming from their liberalism; Will black be the answer to US Jews’ diaspora blues?

American Jews have been led to believe that “the purpose of the Jews in the world is to campaign for higher taxes, sexual permissiveness, reduced military spending, illegal immigration, opposition to fracking, the banishment of religion from the public square and every other liberal cause under the sun — all in the name of God”.

Tikkun olam – literally “healing the world” – requires that Jews heal themselves, and Judaism; it is not carte blanche to change the world in general to meet what liberals believe the world should be; On the 'Tikkun Olam' Fetish:

The idea that it is somehow the religious duty of Jews to “repair mankind” is not only unfounded it is a manifestation of the ignorance of assimilationist Jewish liberals. The simple fact of the matter is that in actual Judaism, it is none of the business of Jews to fix or repair humanity. More generally, in Judaism it is the job of Jews to repair the Jews - a not inconsiderable task - not to repair the world.

I’ve attempted to call such liberal plopping Jews out on multiple occasions, so here’s one Jew that’s definitely not on board; nor are Pamela Geller, Daniel Greenfield, or David Horowitz to cite a few more examples. And consider this article at Elder of Zion about his being pleased with Trump; Donald Trump, disloyal Jews and identity politics (Forest Rain):

I didn’t expect Trump to be a good President. He has surprised me beyond my wildest dreams. His actions have undone a lot of the damage done by the previous administration. He has fulfilled the broken promises of multiple American administrations. Over and over he has spoken out against Jew hate – in America and abroad.

To him I say, thank you Mr. President.

And just a few examples of my own efforts:

Jews Supporting Migrants: Undermining America, the West, and endangering us Jews to boot

Are there people like Soros – a plopping Jew if I ever saw one – as well as the infamous Barbara Spectre (see my article, above) in the thick of it? Yes. But they're among like-minded non-Jews all working on the Big Conspiracy to replace the electorate with a more compliant-to-the-Left population; never mind working to create the chaos out of which they believe will inevitably spring the great Socialist Utopia.

There are many denominations involved in refugee resettlement, protecting illegals, and so on. The local Unitarian church has a rainbow flag and other signage indicating support for sanctuary policies, as one example. Another specific non-Jewish example was discussed by Michelle Malkin here; Defund Lutherans for Open Borders Now! 7/20/19 UPDATE: LCMS considers resolution to “commend” LIRS at international convention. Note how many non-Jewish groups are there...

(Image from article)

In both America and Europe the Left wants multi-culturalism despite the clear effects such “diversity enrichment” is having on the populations (one example, rape rates in Sweden):

[THE LEADER OF THE FREE WORLD / 4:58]

One need not agree with Netanyahu on everything to appreciate the argument I presented to Brock as I replied asking what people like me, he, and others – nationalists who love America, our home – want?

- We want a leader who openly loves his nation and promotes its interests... like Netanyahu does.
- We want a nation bound together by a common language and culture in a high-trust environment... like Israel has.
- We want a nation with strong borders, that enforces & protects those borders, and seeks to stop visitors and immigrants alike that want to take advantage of it, if not outright destroy it... like Israel has and does.
- We want a leader who is willing to take risks, withstand abuse, and all for the sake of defending the nation against existential threats without apology... like Netanyahu does.
- We want a culture that cherishes and encourages having children, nurturing them and instilling cultural values and continuing the faith from generation to generation, believing in the future... like Israel has and does.

Therefore, I concluded to him, this is one reason why I think there's a lot of Israel / Jew hatred among the "white nationalists": a subconscious green-eyed monster. Envy. Envy at having a nation proud of itself, with all the other things above including a leader willing to fight and defend it.

Israel has, and fights to protect, its borders, language, and culture which serves to identify and maintain it as a unique nation and people. Indeed, it is a testament to the Jewish culture that we still have a language and culture across over two millennia of exile and being scattered across the world.

[The Mystery of the Jews / 20:52]

Populists in every nation want precisely this for their own nations. And they're waking up to the fact that their leadership – Merkel, Macron, Democrats, and the UN, etc., etc., etc. – are selling them out.

That's why Salvini is so popular in Italy, and Orban in Hungary. That's why Trump draws crowds to events that make the Democrats seethe with bitter envy. That's why AfD and other populist parties are growing in Western Europe despite the establishments countries desperately attempting to quash them and any debate about mass migration (e.g., IIRC the Swedish Democrats did enormously well in the last election, but thanks to back-room shenanigans they were locked out of any meaningful power despite their strong showing), the enemedia and far-left parties frantically smearing anyone not flogging the bishop over the wonders of multi-culturalism (see this article & embedded video for an example), the social pressures to not admit you want anything but more and more and more diversity lest you be shunned and even lose your job and home... but people yearn for their nations to remain distinct nations, and for leadership that will protect them from "enrichment". Like the Czech Republic is doing. Like Poland is doing. Like Slovenia is doing. Japan's demographics are crashing, but they're electing to remain Japanese rather than admit refugees. They don't want this:

Let me repeat: most people want their nations to remain distinct nations, not one big force-fed migration-o-rama inspired by John Lennon's "Imagine" on autoplay.

[Ben Shapiro trashes John Lennon's "Imagine" / 10:05]

WE COULD AND SHOULD LEARN

Western Civilization is the greatest, most exceptional civilization to have existed - a marriage of Greco-Roman philosophy and Judeo-Christian morality. America, through the Anglosphere, adds in both Anglo-Saxon law and individual liberty to create the greatest, most exceptional nation to have ever existed. Both Western Civilization and America need to be preserved.

Israel has:

Secure borders.

A common language.

A mono-culture that everyone understands and which includes religious faith.

Confidence in itself and its future, as witnessed by a growing population.

America, and the West, need these too. Rather than bashing Israel, and Jews – actual Jews, not liberal plopping JINOs drunk on dopamine addition from leftist virtue signaling – both America and the West should learn the same lessons Israel learned, and wake up:

[Europeans Are Waking Up! | How Even Ordinary People Are Beginning to Take Action Against Immigration / 4:47]

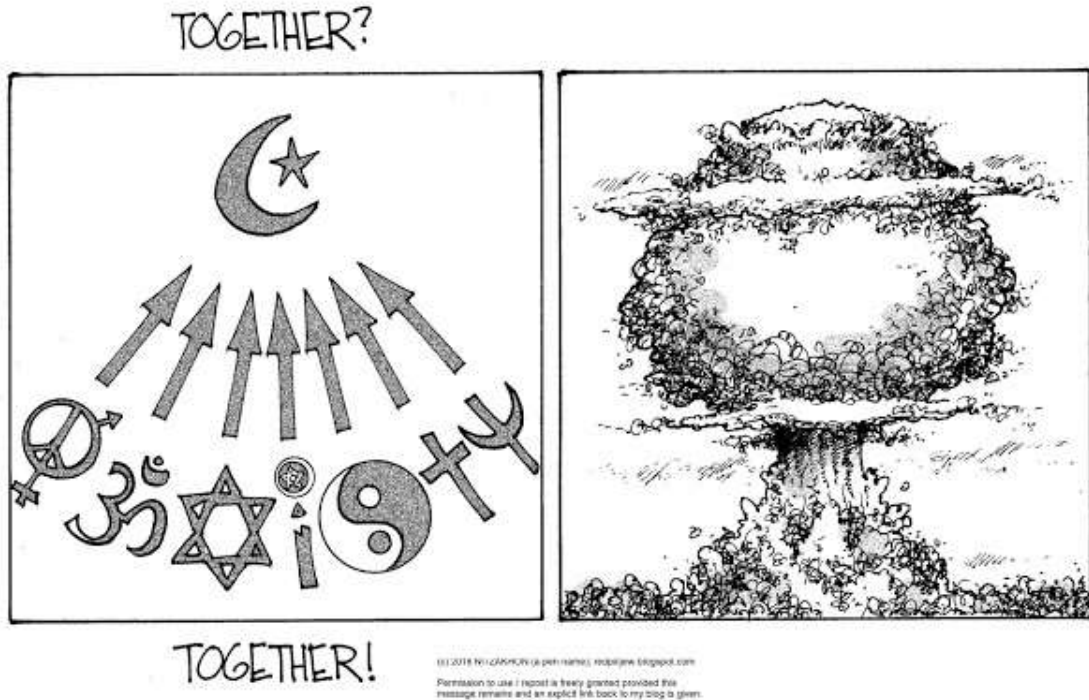

What happens when they fully awaken, and the Elites continue to value the migrants over the natives to the point where the welcoming nations are on the verge of vanishing in all but name, e.g., Germany: 25% of the population and 42% of young children now of migrant backgrounds? I have my fears:

Hashem bless America, and restore it to a country with confidence in itself and pride in its exceptionalism. Hashem bless Western Civilization, and likewise restore to it confidence in itself and appreciation for its enormous history and achievements. And Hashem bless Israel, and keep it safe as a light unto the nations.

I do not coexist with cancer. I do not find common ground with gangrene. The Left, the Globalists, and Islam must be fought and destroyed... or America, Israel, and Western Civilization will die.
